Can acting (sustantivo) be taught? (posibilidad)

You cannot teach (posibilidad) someone to be 'talented', but if an actor possesses natural talent, they must still learn (obligación) how to express it through the skills of the performer: command of voice and speech; a feeling (sustantivo) for words, movement and body language; and how to bring all these things together.

Voice and speech is the actor's primary skill. Most of their communication is through the spoken word, and the scripts actors work with now require a greater variety of voices and accents than they did in the past. However, as the actor is also the interpreter of the text, he or she must be (obligación) very responsive to the character's use of language.

Present-day acting (sustantivo) is also very visual and makes great demands on the actor in terms of physical movement. The actor may have to represent (posibilidad) not only many types of people but also objects and machines. Repose and expressiveness are qualities actors need to convey through the body. They may even find (posibilidad) themselves working (gerundio) in performances which involve dancing (sustantivo; infinitivo), falling (sustantivo; infinitivo) and acrobatics.

Mental training (sustantivo) is vital too. Actors have to give 100% attention to what they are doing (gerundio: are doing > presente continuo); they have to think and respond creatively; to look and learn; and recall and recreate emotion in a selective way. They also have to think deeply about a text and analyse it. Finally, actors have to learn to work with each other, the director and the audience.

Acting (sustantivo; infinitivo) is a very practical business, and what you do has to look and sound right. The audience may not know (situación hipotética) about the mysteries of acting (sustantivo; infinitivo) but they do know about people and life.
